Maputo, Thursday.

THE second meeting of the security commission between Mozambique and South Africa was held in Pretoria today, according to a despatch of the Mozambique news agency (AIM).

The commission, established under the terms of the Nkomati Accord on Non-aggression and good neighbourliness signed between the two countries last month, held its first meeting in Maputo on March 26, this year.

AIM said the Mozambican delegation at today's meeting was led by Deputy Defence Minister, Sergio Vieira, while the South African side was led by Commissioner of Police, General Johann Coetzee.

Progress made in implementing the Nkomati agreement, further steps to facilitate its implementation as well as measures regarding border and airspace control were main issues discussed at the session.

The commission also agreed today that a joint assessment would be made of the requirements for the protection of the Cahora Bassa transmission lines, AIM added.

A series of meetings have been held recently between Mozambique, Portugal and South Africa on renegotiating the terms under which power from Cahora Bassa is sold to Pretoria, and ensuring that Mozambique receives an income from the scheme.

The next meeting of the joint security commission will be held in Maputo in early May.

In Lusaka, Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda said last night time had come for a summit meeting with South African Prime Minister Pieter Botha and all six leaders of the southern Africa Frontline States to discuss the region.

The Zambia News Agency (ZANA) quoted Kaunda's declared willingness because he has no doubt as to the value of such a meeting.

The president was speaking in an interview with the editor and publisher of a South African magazine Leadership SA Hugh Murray published in its current issue.

He said such a meeting would enable Botha to know the thinking of all the leaders of the Frontline States, especially those he has not met.

The impact of such a summit on Botha would be obviously more than if he met with one person at a time, Kaunda said, adding that he was quite sure that time for such a meeting had come.

Such a meeting would also cut cross the problems of suspicious when discussing apartheid, adding that a meeting of this type would be "good, really very good indeed, but the principle behind it must be examined carefully".

Asked whether the initiative would have to come from the Frontliners or South Africa, Kaunda quipped: "It is a difficult one but obviously it must come from the Frontline States."

"This means the heads themselves must discuss this in their own caucus and decide how to go about it".
