Britain has called on the South African Government to respect the terms of a non-aggression pact with Mozambique, making clear for the first time in public that it believes Pretoria has been violating the pact signed at the border town of Nkomati in 1984. The US has already charged SA with continuing to back the Renamo rebel movement in Mozambique despite the treaty. The call, renewed at a news conference yesterday, came in a speech by Sir Geoffrey Howe, the British Foreign Secretary, intended to reinforce Britain's backing for black Southern African states' efforts to reduce trade and transport links with South Africa.
